

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY

The Royal Historical Society has been associated with The Annual Register for over 60 years, and we are delighted to congratulate the Register on its 250th volume in unbroken series. Fifty years ago Asa Briggs wrote that “For 200 years The Annual Register has provided a sustained and successful example of the writing of contemporary history”, and this remains true to the present day. The content of the Register has changed enormously over its long life, from its 18th century concentration on British and European affairs to its present worldwide coverage; the vigorous opinions—not to say prejudices—of Edmund Burke’s time have given way to a remarkable degree of balance, detachment and accuracy. The Annual Register is an important source for historical research, and indeed has become a part of history in itself, while remaining a treasure trove for the general reader. The Royal Historical Society extends its warmest congratulations to The Annual Register on the publication of its 250th volume, and wishes it every success in the future.
